The Mothers' Voices Project:

A Collaborative Effort to Attend to the Voices of Bereaved Mothers

In our growing multicultural world, it is imperative that we answer the call to action for improving bereavement services and outreach as well as promoting infant health efforts for the benefit of all families. This call to action is especially important for African American families who tend to be disproportionately impacted by infant death. In an effort to answer this call to action, a collaborative partnership was formed between the KIDS Network and a team of community psychologists at Wichita State University to launch the Mothers' Voices Project.

As a bereaved sibling and community psychologist interested in maternal and infant health and well-being, I was ecstatic about the opportunity to work with the KIDS Network on this project. The purpose of the Mothers Voices Project was to understand the experience of perinatal bereavement and the earlier life experiences (preceding fetal or infant death) of African American women in Kansas. We were able to conduct in-depth interviews with six women about their life experiences from childhood to adulthood and about their experience of grief and healing after the death of their infant. This project was guided by the life course perspective which is a multidisciplinary framework that focuses on understanding how early life experiences and social contexts shape health across the lifespan. Essentially, it emphasizes the importance of examining how various contexts shape individuals' health outcomes across the life stages.

The women who participated in the Mothers' Voices Project shared powerful and inspiring stories which we intend to use to help other women and to make an impact in the Wichita community. For example, the mothers who participated shared stories about the importance of social/family support and well-being, their encounters within the health care system and their experiences with grief and bereavement service use. We, the research partnership team, are truly thankful to this group of courageous women for sharing their voices with us. At the conclusion of the project, we created handmade memorial keepsakes for each mother as a token of appreciation, and invited them to engage in upcoming activities sponsored by the KIDS Network and other community organizations.

This project was important because it was intentional about attending to the often unheard voices and stories of bereaved African American families. This enabled us to identify major themes regarding social, life and health care experiences that impact both infant health and bereavement. The information from this project can be used by health professionals and communities to promote positive changes. For example, the KIDS Network was able to generate new ideas about support group topics based on information provided by Mothers Voices participants. I want to emphasize that although we have completed the project our collaborative work is not done yet! We are working on circulating the findings from the project to other organizations and groups in Wichita who may be able to use the information to make a positive impact in community and health care settings.

Overall, I am excited about the work that we are doing as well as our next steps for promoting the health and well-being of Kansas families. I also look forward to sharing with you research highlights from the Mothers Voices Project in the upcoming newsletter issues.
